

Statement of Societal Interaction

Steven V. Miller

Institutionen för ekonomisk historia och internationella relationer, Stockholms Universitet

steven.miller@ekohist.su.se

I am a firm believer that a political scientist should do much more than just produce research to be read by other political scientists. Our primary goal as political scientists is to produce research as public goods to be shared broadly with the general public. Toward that end, I have endeavored to keep as broad a public profile as I can while maintaining the rigor normally associated with research distributed among political scientists. In this document, I explain the extent of my societal interaction through invited commentary, interviews, and the provision of sources and quotes to media outlets on miscellaneous topics of interest. My CV contains full information and links to these particular quotes, interviews, and invited commentary. This document will offer a summary of these interactions. It starts with a description of my invited commentary in various news outlets. Thereafter, I describe the various topics on which I have been asked to provide commentary.

I have ample experience writing for the general public through numerous platforms. My former university's online magazine, Clemson Newsstand, carried an article I wrote for it in 2014 explaining the implications of the Russian invasion of Crimea. More recent invited commentary has focused on the current political moment in the United States. Therein, I have written about cognitive racism and the 2018 House of Representatives vote for Data for Progress and how racism and authoritarianism go hand in hand for Vox in July, 2018. I have written twice for The Monkey Cage at Washington Post. The first was a 2015 article on the appeals of then-candidate Donald Trump as it coincided with another strongman leader he openly admires (Vladimir Putin). The second was a 2017 article on what we know about public opinion and gun control, written shortly after the Mandalay Bay shooting that stands as the deadliest terrorist incident (in the Global Terrorism Database) in the United States since 9/11.

Interviews through various media outlets comprise the bulk of my societal interactions and these discussions with various media outlets involve one of a select few topics on which I am well known in the United States and internationally. The politics of gun control and gun violence, a unique problem in the United States, is the typical interview request I get. It stems from a blog post I wrote in 2015, which later became a peer-reviewed publication in 2019. I have provided background research and quotes on gun violence and gun control that featured in journalistic write-ups by Bloomberg BusinessWeek, CNN, NBC News, and The Washington Post. I have even done international outreach on this topic for journalists abroad looking for context on the unique problem of gun violence in the United States. For example, I offered some commentary to some questions about American gun violence for Correio Braziliense in Brazil and did a radio interview with BBC Radio 5 Live in the United Kingdom.

I also routinely discuss the issue of creeping authoritarianism in the United States with journalists both in the United States and abroad who want academic expertise on how Donald Trump threatens American democracy. Much of this stems from a few publications—in Conflict Management and Peace Science, Political Behavior, and Political Research Quarterly—that proved prescient for contextualizing the rise of Donald Trump in the United States. A follow-up publication with Nicholas T. Davis in Journal of Race, Ethnicity, and Politics made an explicit link between white outgroup prejudice in the United States and the rejection of democracy as a legitimate form of government for the United States. These papers received considerable press both domestically and abroad. MacLean's in Canada featured my early research on this topic in March 2016. I did an interview with Nicholas

T. Davis for the This is Hell! podcast in June 2018. I also provided background quotes and context for write-ups in NBC News, Salon, and Think Progress.

My research on the topic of “economic anxiety” and anti-immigration attitudes in the United States has also generated some press and interactions with society through the media. Briefly, a peer-reviewed publication of mine at Social Science Journal collects a battery of economic indicators—ranging from unemployment rates to tax returns—to show that the effect of “economic anxiety” on immigration attitudes is minimal relative to an ethnocentric disposition that treats immigrants as outgroups that are undesirable and unworthy of representation. This is a major challenge to how American news media approaches anti-immigration opinions in the United States, an approach that routinely gives the benefit of doubt to xenophobia and nativism within a political economy of immigration framework. My research has challenged this. I had the opportunity to discuss this research in radio interviews in Boston and New York. I have provided additional context and quotes on this topic that featured in news outlets like Mother Jones, The New York Times, and The Washington Post.

Finally, I ran The Palmetto Poll at Clemson University for a period of three years, often serving as lead researcher for the construction of surveys of citizen attitudes in South Carolina. Recently, these have included the Democratic presidential primary in February 2020 and the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic. These too have resulted in interviews for local news outlets like WSPA \(CBS\) and WYFF \(NBC\) in addition to radio interviews with statewide radio programs like WRNN 99.5 - Hot Talk and South Carolina Public Radio.

My CV again lists all these media appearances with direct links to where anyone could hear, read, or see the scope of my comments. I offer this statement as a summary of these contributions and also as an emphasis on why I try to make myself broadly available to communities as varying as my former community in Upstate South Carolina, Brazilian newspaper subscribers, Canadian magazine readers, and radio listeners in the United Kingdom. An important part of being an academic is an ability and willingness to produce knowledge for general consumption by society. I take that seriously and have made myself available and accessible toward that end.